

Family Graveyards

Family Graveyards were a common practice of rural protestants of southern or midwestern heritage. As the local protestant churchyard or cemetery may have been a great distance from the family home, it was commonplace to bury several generations of loved ones in a cemetery plot on your families' land. Often these family plots contain several generations of family members as well as family slaves and freed blacks who lived near their former owners.

Family graveyards were once common across St. Louis County anywhere a family might have been isolated. As development pushed westward, many of the family plots have been exhumed and transferred to a protestant or community burial ground. Those family plots which remain mostly exist in rural western edge of St. Louis County in Wildwood, Ellisville, Chesterfield, and Eureka.
